Residents Who Live Near Public Transportation Live Healthier, Study Finds

A new report, released by the American Public Transportation Association (APTA) on August 8th, has found that people who live in communities with high-quality public transportation drive less, exercise more, live longer, and are generally healthier than residents of communities that lack quality public transit. These communities include residents who drive less, exposing them to a lower risk of fatal vehicle accidents. Such communities also have less pollution, because public transportation produces far less emissions per passenger mile than private automobiles. In addition, people who live near quality public transit are more likely to undertake regular physical activity than residents of automobile-dependent communities. Read more at Live Longer
